Business Resilience Mentoring

The importance of business resilience has been highlighted by recent global and economic events. Businesses need to be able to adapt to a rapidly changing environment where previous assumptions about business resilience are no longer valid.

SMEs are especially vulnerable when there are fluctuations or shocks that affect their capability and capacity to meet their commitments to customers and suppliers.

Company owners, director and managers need to adapt to these new circumstances in what can be a challenging and stressful time, whilst at the same time creating new business opportunities for growth.

The factors that influence business resilience are multifaceted and require leaders to be able to manage the trade-offs that affect product and service delivery, sales, cash flow and profits.

The nature of business resilience means these will be interlinked with all aspects of the business. Individual mentoring provides the opportunity to examine in-depth the specific issues faced within a business.
